Raising healthy children sounds pretty simple: Good nutrition and 60 minutes of physical activity a day protects kids from obesity, diabetes, and a host of chronic diseases later in life. These days though, health-conscious parents have to compete against any number of unhealthy temptations. "The environment plays a huge role in supporting unhealthy habits," says Tara LaRowe, PhD, assistant scientist in the Department of Family Medicine at University of Wisconsin-Madison. As a parent, what can you do? But healthy food prep does not have to keep you chained to the kitchen. With a little groundwork, you can plan to: Buy foods that are healthy and convenient. Frozen fruits and vegetables can "health up" a family meal with little effort. A can of low-sodium beans can add protein in about a minute.
